Doctors Ask for More Objective Use of Narcotic Sedation

CHICAGO—Two Pennsylvania physicians have called for a more objective approach in the use of narcotics for sedation before surgery.

Writing in the Journal of the American Medical Association, Drs. James E. Eckenhoff and Martin Helrich, both of Philadelphia, said "Preoperative medication should be tailored to meet the needs of the patient and his operation."

Their study was undertaken to compare the effectiveness of three commonly used narcotics — morphine, meperdine, and alphaprodine—with that of secobarbital and a saline solution.

Results of the study on 1,400 surgical patients indicate that narcotics should be used as preoperative sedatives only "with a specific objective in mind and with an awareness of the hazards inherent in their use," the doctors said.

Preoperative medication is intended to reduce fear and apprehension and produce a relaxed and tranquil patient. It is also important that the drugs involved leave the patient with a minimum of side-effects.

Narcotics produced more drowsiness or sleep in patients than did the barbituate. They also produced a higher degree of apprehension and many undesirable side-effects such as dizziness, nausea, and vomiting. These side-effects were found to a much lesser degree when using secobarbital or the solution.

In addition to reducing the amount of side-effects, the doctors said "secobarbital led to a higher portion of calm, carefree, yet alert patients than did the narcotics."

Giving Blood is Dolly's Delight

URBANA, Ill.—One of the biggest blood donors in Illinois is named Dolly.

She has already donated 264 gallons of blood, and they say she may double this amount. Her life is dedicated to this lone job. Dolly is an old gray mare living at the University of Illinois veterinary research farm.

Ray Hamilton, laboratory technician, has taken blood from Dolly since 1947 at the rate of 8 liters a month. The 24-year-old mare has given over 8 barrels for scientific research.

Dolly provides blood for the University's Bacteriology and Chemistry laboratories, State Health Laboratory, Chanute Air Force Base, local hospitals, Cook County hospital and the University of Illinois Medical College and College of veterinary medicine.

The farm is used principally for research, but also for student instruction.

Hoppers Climb Stems For Relief From Heat

BERKELEY, Calif.—On scorching summer days, grasshoppers climb up stems of grass and other plants to take advantage of the natural "air conditioning."

This is the observation of University of California entomologists who recently checked temperatures at 32 different locations above and below the ground in a foothill area.

In the duff or ground cover, they recorded mid-day temperatures as high as 120 degrees F.—hot enough to kill most grasshoppers.

But at the same time, temperatures only two inches above the ground were as much as 35 degrees cooler.

This temperature difference, says entomologist W. W. Middlekauf, may help to explain why grasshoppers eat more during a cool summer.

When the temperature climbs, grasshoppers climb with them to survive. Instinctively, they adapt to conditions where no shade is available. But as long as the insects are perched on stems, waiting for relief from the heat, their eating activities are sharply curtailed.

Route Of Columbus Is Open To Questions

WASHINGTON—A retracing of the probable first voyage of Columbus through the Bahama Islands indicates that previous constructions of the route are far from satisfactory.

This is the conclusion of Edwin A. Link, well-known aviation training equipment inventor and manufacturer of Binghampton, N. Y., and Mrs. Link, in a report of a trip in which they tried to follow the great navigator's path both from references in his journal and the physical appearance of the islands visited.

Sound Footing

NEW YORK—Wooden shoes are making a comeback. In part, at least.

Wood is being used by a leading manufacturer as an insulator in golf shoes. Specially fabricated birch is inserted between the inner-sole and the outside of these shoes.

The manufacturer says the foundation inserts lessen foot fatigue.
